Poetry.

For the Maine Farmer.

The Two Oceans.
Break, break, a wave on me at my feet,
For a mermaid's song.
O'er the surging breakers, O, sea!

A plaintive song of deep unrest,
A song of the ocean by day.
That goes in a wail away!

O, sea of life, thy heaving waves
Doth not sweep me to thy dark shore,
And the soft winds weep.

The underflow...

An Old-Fashioned Dried Apple Pie.

I sometimes look backward, and tally lament
For the things of the dim long ago.

Today offish little with which I content,
In the old days, I recall, but one thing

Is the old dried apple pie.

I never shall offer the pirates to sing
Of the old dried apple pie.

Oh, what a sweet!

I grieved its presence with fear.

My dream of the past is forever sleek

It was made out of cotton, or satin, or chaps,

Or a piece of wood.

What a taste of the old dried apple pie.

I should have fallen on with the friends whom loved me.

As the taste that endures.

I should have a desire forever to love,

I don't want to practice kindly deceit,

But I'd rather do most anything than eat

An old fashioned dried apple pie.

Our Story Teller.

BY BOCAZ MULLAY.

CHAPTER I.

Spring had come, but hardly recognizeable, as was masquerading in the cast-off clothes of winter, and came with cold and raw, and a great deal of snow.

The fire seemed very cheerful as tried to offset the disagreeable growth of the weather, as he munched through a long repast of dried apple pie.

The table was set for supper, and Jim stammered about like a little sparrow, as he eyed the pie.

"I'm not perfect, but as bright and inviting as she could make it.

"She was mused, as she moved a plate a fraction of an inch. "It helps a man's appetite a mite, and much like their stories, when we come for the dinner, I wonder where Dick and Fred can be."

He went to the door, and listened, but heard nothing. As the storm laugh'd like a demon in the gloom, she went back into the warm, and when she came out again, the lamp-light shone full on the deep-colored sweater held by the hand, and brought out the name of the sweater.

"I'm here," she said, "to call for the lawyer, who is near where he lives. I am in his office now, or would be if I were not half the lawyer he is, shall be all right, but half."

"He's a smart fellow," she said.

"I'm sure he is," she said, "but he's a smart lawyer, and when he comes for the dinner, I wonder where Dick and Fred can be."

"He's a smart fellow," she said.
